

Individual Reflection

Week 2

Malin Rosén

This week we continued working on Scrum and how to use it efficiently. We also looked at “Slicing the cake”, and how to set up good user stories. This is something that I really would like to get better at, since I find it hard to not make the user stories too technical.

I still think that some people in our group still need some help with git, which is why we will set all that up completely and also create our user stories early next week. This is so everyone will feel comfortable when we begin coding and such week 4. I also think that we all will help each other next week when we write our user stories, since we’re going to use the “slice the cake”-technique.

This week we mostly used Scrum during exercises, such as the Minetest one. We all felt very comfortable helping each other, which made the sprints easier. I also feel that once I got into the mindset of how the sprints worked, it worked very well. I also set up a Trello Scrum-board for the team to use during the rest of the project.

This week’s deliverables were the project scope, the business model canvas, a mockup, as well as a project description. My focus was on the mockup, but we all contributed to mostly everything since we were in a voice call and could ask questions and feedback at any time. I also read everything through and provided some pointers, and so did everyone else.