Individual Reflection

Week 6

Malin Rosén

This week we figured out the calendar and we made sure that you could make a booking as a patient and create a booking as an admin. It was a bit tricky since it was a lot of backend work, and I'm more comfortable with the frontend part personally. This meant that we had to look more stuff up as we went along, which meant that it took a bit more time. My goal hasn't really changed since last week; I still want to get better at coding and using the backend than I am now, which means that I only have to keep working with it to get better.

As mentioned in previous reflections, I have experience with HTML, CSS and JavaScript which means that I often have been able to guide the other team members who are not as familiar in some ways. This week though, we all helped each other in a way, since neither of us were always sure of what to do.

I helped with the user stories and created the tasks based on them, and I made sure that they were moved to the correct columns while we we're working. I also helped make decisions as the scrum master, so that decision making processes would go quicker and smoother.

As previous weeks, I helped with the team reflection, which is still going well. We all make sure that it's up to our standards, and everyone helps out.
